Fox has dedicated the last 6 years of his practice to representing children with serious birth defects as a result of their mother’s use of antidepressants during pregnancy. In 2006, he, along with his partner Sean Tracey and Clayton's Clark's firm, filed and litigated with the very first Paxil birth defect case—achieving an extraordinary result for Chase Steele and his mother Lisa Collins. In October 2009, he was a member of the trial team that tried the only Paxil case to reach a verdict in the Court of Common Pleas in Philadelphia, which resulted in a multi-million award for Lyam Kilker and his family.

Fox currently represents hundreds of children with birth defects as a result of maternal ingestion of Zoloft, Prozac, Celexa, Lexapro and Effexor, with cases filed in various courts around the country.
