On January 21, 2010, the Supreme Court of the U.S. produced a ruling about the need for open and robust political spending. Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission’s legacy may make the hundreds of millions spent in past presidential and congressional elections look like a pittance. By removing the restraints on what and when for- and non-profit corporations may “say” during federal campaigns, the Court has raised the stakes for all such elections. But campaign finance regulation remains in flux.

The lingering issues following Citizens United include:
May labor unions freely spend on elections? Are foreign corporations with U.S. operations under the same restrictions as domestic ones? Does the distinction of “express advocacy” versus “issue advocacy” in political messages still matter?

These and other questions will be discussed at Campaign Finance Regulation and the Law Post-Citizens United. UH Law Center PROFESSOR JOHN JAY DOUGLASS, an election and campaign finance law scholar, and Baker Botts partner JIM GRACE ’92, an expert on corporate and government relations and campaign finance compliance, will lead the discussion that can change who occupies the halls of Congress and the White House.
